Read the following passage, then answer the questions that follow:

Even though they were twin sisters, Mary and Jane were nothing alike. If Mary wanted to jump rope, Jane wanted to play basketball. If Jane wanted to watch comedy films, Mary wanted to watch action films. Troubles have become more and more; the girls could no longer love the company of one another.

Mary and Jane were in the same class at school. It seemed that they had nothing in common, until the day that they received their grade reports. While riding the bus home from school, the girls realized that they were both failing a subject. Mary was failing Math and Jane was failing Reading. Since both girls wanted to pass their classes and succeed in the subjects, they agreed to help one another. Every day after school for the next few weeks, Mary taught Jane the reading lessons and then Jane taught Mary Math.

By the time grade reports were given, Mary and Jane were passing all of their classes. The girls were delighted. They are now sharing everything, watching films together and practising the same sport. Their mother was the happiest of all; not just because her daughters passed their classes, but because they had learned to be good sisters.
