- Read the following passage carefully, then answer the questions that follow:

Once upon a time, if we wanted to make a phone call or wait for someone to contact us, we had to sit at home or at our desks. There were public phones in the street, of course but it could be hard to find one that was working. So people didn't phone their friends as often. Mobile phones, these small pieces of electronic equipment which allow us to talk with friends and family while we are on the move, have dramatically changed the way we live.

Before the age of the mobile phone, our loved ones would sit around, worried sick if we were late coming home. There were no quick calls to tell our mothers that there would be guests coming for dinner. We would leave notes on fridges or desks to communicate messages.

But mobile phones have also had a negative effect and what people don't seem to realise is that we've lost something very valuable: having some private times. Now our friends and family can contact us whenever and wherever they want to. The way people communicate with each other is completely different now. It's difficult to talk to a friend without being stopped every couple of minutes by the ring of their phone. Most people don't see anything wrong in having a long talk on their mobile phones while forgetting all about the persons sitting opposite to them, to whom they should be talking to.

Of course, people could leave their mobile phones at home or even switch them off but no one ever does that. Why not? Because they think that they can't live without their phones.
